Biography

Owen Payne White, writer and editor, was born in El Paso on June 9, 1879. He was the second son of Alward and Katherine J. (Payne) White. He graduated from El Paso High School in May 27, 1896. In 1896, he attended the University of Texas at Austin, but returned to El Paso after only a few months. White also studied Law at New York University but never graduated. He served in World War I as a sergeant in a medical unit. He married Hazel Harvey on January 22, 1920. That same year he became a columnist for the El Paso Herald.

Owen P. White wrote nine books and numerous articles about El Paso and the Southwest. His first book, Out of the Desert, published in 1923, was a local history of El Paso and brought him to the attention of H. L. Mencken, editor of The American Mercury. After a review of Out of the Desert appeared in the New York Times, White was asked to cover the inauguration of Miriam A. "Ma" Ferguson as governor of Texas. This resulted in the New York Times offering him a job. He moved to New York in 1925 and settled in Cutchogue, Long Island, where he lived until his death. For the next couple of years, White worked as a freelance writer for several magazines. In 1926 he joined Collier's as an associate editor and staff writer, where he worked until 1940. During his time at Collier's, White attracted national attention for muckraking and speaking out against corrupt politicians, particularly those from Texas. His criticism of the oil industry and graft in the Lower Rio Grande valley brought the threat of lawsuits against both White and Collier's. His final work, Western Trails, all but finished at the time of his death, was never published. It dealt with the major travel routes west of the Mississippi from the sixteenth century until 1836.

Owen P. White died in December 1946 at age the age of 67. He was survived by his wife and his sister, Leigh White Osborn, but he left no children. In November of 2000, he was inducted into the El Paso County Historical Society's Hall of Honor.
